Textured hair in production: what counsel needs to know.

A 90-minute, interactive professional education session for attorneys

WHY IT MATTERS

In theater, television and film, productions decide the design, hire the professionals, set the time and resources, and create the conditions hair services happen under. Those decisions affect a performer's hair, scalp and livelihood, and whether they can speak up when something isn't right.

Collective bargaining agreements and workplace protections address parts of this. Contract language alone can't show whether a production has the expertise, planning, resources and systems to deliver on them.

WHAT WE'LL EXAMINE

Hair and scalp fundamentals

How hair types, services and techniques differ, and why a cosmetology license alone may not establish competence for a specific service.

The production system

How design, staffing, scheduling, purchasing, budgets and department authority shape what happens to a performer.

Consent and performer agency

What meaningful consultation and consent require at work, especially when a performer feels pressure to accept a service.

Care and escalation

How productions receive concerns, respond to pain or injury, document incidents, and give someone authority to stop harm.

Contracts and implementation

How to tell existing legal and contractual obligations apart from the operational practices a production needs to be ready.

WHAT YOU'LL LEAVE WITH

- A clearer understanding of textured-hair services and production risks
- Practical questions for assessing hair-service readiness
- A map of where contracts, employment practices and operations meet
- A way to tell when an organization needs production-readiness support

WHO IT'S FOR

Employment and labor attorneys, entertainment counsel, union legal teams, plaintiff-side advocates, in-house counsel, and attorneys who advise arts organizations and conservatories.
